Mr. Al. Jones received word to-day that the team of horses hired by Dick Gird and party had died on the road to Sonora. Mr. Jones informed a reporter today that the horses were not his, but belonged to the Silver City stable. Al received a note from Charleston this morning from Mr. Gird that when they arrived at the custom house the horses seemed to be sick, and he thought it advisable to hire a Mexican team, which he did, to continue on the journey, and sent the sick horses back in charge of a driver to Tombstone. When the driver reached Charleston he put the horses in Carr's corral. During the night one of the horses died, and the other one the next morning.

A Card.

EDITOR TOMBSTONE—I see by the El Paso papers that the desperado, bulldozer and tough, and betrayer of our sex, has met his just dues, and that he died at all desparados, in his boots. This man Raynor was a curse to civilization, not a friend did he have on earth. This man, like the late chief of police Studymeyer, had a hatred to the Irish race, and in every possible way did his best to put them to all the trouble possible.

I am a woman, and now that this desperado is dead—it may not be feeling to condemn him, but I do—I want the world to know that at least one of these terrible desperados has gone to had a place that he never will return from—and may all of his kind go the same way. I told him, this same Raynor, that he would die in his boots inside of five days and he did so.
